October 28, 2009

The Honorable Michael Arcuri
U.S. House of Representatives
127 Cannon HOB
Washington, DC 20515

Dear Representative Arcuri,

On behalf of the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops, I write to commend you for cosponsoring the House of Representatives’ Resolution 761 on October 21, 2009, remembering the murder and commemorating the lives and work of the six Jesuit Priests, their housekeeper and her daughter in El Salvador. Your support and acknowledgment of the important education work of Catholic religious communities and institutions like the University of Central America José Simeón Cañas in El Salvador as well as the 28 Jesuit Colleges and Universities in the United States, is especially fitting.

As you know, the Catholic Church carries on the work of education with the goal of forming leaders that have great concern for the social and moral needs of the people. H. Res 761 rightly acknowledges “the legacy of the murdered Jesuits to reduce poverty and hunger and promote education opportunity, human rights, the rule of law, and social equity for the people of El Salvador.” This legacy continues to be embodied in the many women and men who continue to seek a more just, peaceful and secure world in charity and solidarity.

Pope Benedict XVI, in his most recent encyclical, Charity in Truth, states that “Charity is at the heart of the Church’s social doctrine. … [Charity] gives real substance to the personal relationship with God and with neighbour; it is the principle not only of micro-relationships (with friends, with family members or within small groups) but also of macro-relationships (social, economic and political ones).” It is precisely this kind of charity that was exemplified by the Jesuits in El Salvador—a commitment to a more just and peaceful society where the human needs and rights of people are acknowledged and respected. The martyred Jesuits sought the common good, as many other Church members continue to do today. “To desire the common good and strive towards it is a requirement of justice and charity,” Pope Benedict XVI states in his encyclical.

USCCB joins you in commemorating the lives and work of the six Jesuits and their collaborators, and in continuing to seek ways to build the common good, not only in El Salvador but throughout our world.

Sincerely yours,

Most Reverend Howard J. Hubbard
Bishop of Albany
Chairman
Committee on International Justice and Peace
October 28, 2009

The Honorable Shelley Berkley
U.S. House of Representatives
405 Cannon HOB
Washington, DC 20515

Dear Representative Berkley,

On behalf of the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops, I write to commend you for cosponsoring the House of Representatives’ Resolution 761 on October 21, 2009, remembering the murder and commemorating the lives and work of the six Jesuit Priests, their housekeeper and her daughter in El Salvador. Your support and acknowledgment of the important education work of Catholic religious communities and institutions like the University of Central America José Simeón Cañas in El Salvador as well as the 28 Jesuit Colleges and Universities in the United States, is especially fitting.

As you know, the Catholic Church carries on the work of education with the goal of forming leaders that have great concern for the social and moral needs of the people. H. Res 761 rightly acknowledges “the legacy of the murdered Jesuits to reduce poverty and hunger and promote education opportunity, human rights, the rule of law, and social equity for the people of El Salvador.” This legacy continues to be embodied in the many women and men who continue to seek a more just, peaceful and secure world in charity and solidarity.

Pope Benedict XVI, in his most recent encyclical, Charity in Truth, states that “Charity is at the heart of the Church's social doctrine. … [Charity] gives real substance to the personal relationship with God and with neighbour; it is the principle not only of micro-relationships (with friends, with family members or within small groups) but also of macro-relationships (social, economic and political ones).” It is precisely this kind of charity that was exemplified by the Jesuits in El Salvador—a commitment to a more just and peaceful society where the human needs and rights of people are acknowledged and respected. The martyred Jesuits sought the common good, as many other Church members continue to do today. “To desire the common good and strive towards it is a requirement of justice and charity,” Pope Benedict XVI states in his encyclical.

USCCB joins you in commemorating the lives and work of the six Jesuits and their collaborators, and in continuing to seek ways to build the common good, not only in El Salvador but throughout our world.

Sincerely yours,

Most Reverend Howard J. Hubbard
Bishop of Albany
Chairman
Committee on International Justice and Peace
The Honorable Lois Capps
U.S. House of Representatives
1110 Longworth HOB
Washington, DC 20515

Dear Representative Capps,

On behalf of the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops, I write to commend you for cosponsoring the House of Representatives’ Resolution 761 on October 21, 2009, remembering the murder and commemorating the lives and work of the six Jesuit Priests, their housekeeper and her daughter in El Salvador. Your support and acknowledgment of the important education work of Catholic religious communities and institutions like the University of Central America José Simeón Cañas in El Salvador as well as the 28 Jesuit Colleges and Universities in the United States, is especially fitting.

As you know, the Catholic Church carries on the work of education with the goal of forming leaders that have great concern for the social and moral needs of the people. H. Res 761 rightly acknowledges “the legacy of the murdered Jesuits to reduce poverty and hunger and promote education opportunity, human rights, the rule of law, and social equity for the people of El Salvador.” This legacy continues to be embodied in the many women and men who continue to seek a more just, peaceful and secure world in charity and solidarity.

Pope Benedict XVI, in his most recent encyclical, Charity in Truth, states that “Charity is at the heart of the Church's social doctrine. … [Charity] gives real substance to the personal relationship with God and with neighbour; it is the principle not only of micro-relationships (with friends, with family members or within small groups) but also of macro-relationships (social, economic and political ones).” It is precisely this kind of charity that was exemplified by the Jesuits in El Salvador—a commitment to a more just and peaceful society where the human needs and rights of people are acknowledged and respected. The martyred Jesuits sought the common good, as many other Church members continue to do today. “To desire the common good and strive towards it is a requirement of justice and charity,” Pope Benedict XVI states in his encyclical.

USCCB joins you in commemorating the lives and work of the six Jesuits and their collaborators, and in continuing to seek ways to build the common good, not only in El Salvador but throughout our world.

Sincerely yours,

Most Reverend Howard J. Hubbard
Bishop of Albany
Chairman
Committee on International Justice and Peace
October 28, 2009

The Honorable Gerald E. Connolly
U.S. House of Representatives
327 Cannon HOB
Washington, DC 20515

Dear Representative Connolly,

On behalf of the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops, I write to commend you for cosponsoring the House of Representatives’ Resolution 761 on October 21, 2009, remembering the murder and commemorating the lives and work of the six Jesuit Priests, their housekeeper and her daughter in El Salvador. Your support and acknowledgment of the important education work of Catholic religious communities and institutions like the University of Central America José Simeón Cañas in El Salvador as well as the 28 Jesuit Colleges and Universities in the United States, is especially fitting.

As you know, the Catholic Church carries on the work of education with the goal of forming leaders that have great concern for the social and moral needs of the people. H. Res 761 rightly acknowledges “the legacy of the murdered Jesuits to reduce poverty and hunger and promote education opportunity, human rights, the rule of law, and social equity for the people of El Salvador.” This legacy continues to be embodied in the many women and men who continue to seek a more just, peaceful and secure world in charity and solidarity.

Pope Benedict XVI, in his most recent encyclical, Charity in Truth, states that “Charity is at the heart of the Church's social doctrine. … [Charity] gives real substance to the personal relationship with God and with neighbour; it is the principle not only of micro-relationships (with friends, with family members or within small groups) but also of macro-relationships (social, economic and political ones).” It is precisely this kind of charity that was exemplified by the Jesuits in El Salvador—a commitment to a more just and peaceful society where the human needs and rights of people are acknowledged and respected. The martyred Jesuits sought the common good, as many other Church members continue to do today. “To desire the common good and strive towards it is a requirement of justice and charity,” Pope Benedict XVI states in his encyclical.

USCCB joins you in commemorating the lives and work of the six Jesuits and their collaborators, and in continuing to seek ways to build the common good, not only in El Salvador but throughout our world.

Sincerely yours,

Most Reverend Howard J. Hubbard
Bishop of Albany
Chairman
Committee on International Justice and Peace
October 28, 2009

The Honorable Joseph Courtney
U.S. House of Representatives
215 Cannon HOB
Washington, DC 20515

Dear Representative Courtney,

On behalf of the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops, I write to commend you for cosponsoring the House of Representatives’ Resolution 761 on October 21, 2009, remembering the murder and commemorating the lives and work of the six Jesuit Priests, their housekeeper and her daughter in El Salvador. Your support and acknowledgment of the important education work of Catholic religious communities and institutions like the University of Central America José Simeón Cañas in El Salvador as well as the 28 Jesuit Colleges and Universities in the United States, is especially fitting.

As you know, the Catholic Church carries on the work of education with the goal of forming leaders that have great concern for the social and moral needs of the people. H. Res 761 rightly acknowledges “the legacy of the murdered Jesuits to reduce poverty and hunger and promote education opportunity, human rights, the rule of law, and social equity for the people of El Salvador.” This legacy continues to be embodied in the many women and men who continue to seek a more just, peaceful and secure world in charity and solidarity.

Pope Benedict XVI, in his most recent encyclical, Charity in Truth, states that “Charity is at the heart of the Church's social doctrine. … [Charity] gives real substance to the personal relationship with God and with neighbour; it is the principle not only of micro-relationships (with friends, with family members or within small groups) but also of macro-relationships (social, economic and political ones).” It is precisely this kind of charity that was exemplified by the Jesuits in El Salvador—a commitment to a more just and peaceful society where the human needs and rights of people are acknowledged and respected. The martyred Jesuits sought the common good, as many other Church members continue to do today. “To desire the common good and strive towards it is a requirement of justice and charity,” Pope Benedict XVI states in his encyclical.

USCCB joins you in commemorating the lives and work of the six Jesuits and their collaborators, and in continuing to seek ways to build the common good, not only in El Salvador but throughout our world.

Sincerely yours,

Most Reverend Howard J. Hubbard
Bishop of Albany
Chairman
Committee on International Justice and Peace
October 28, 2009

The Honorable Joseph Crowley
U.S. House of Representatives
2404 Rayburn HOB
Washington, DC 20515

Dear Representative Crowley,

On behalf of the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops, I write to commend you for cosponsoring the House of Representatives’ Resolution 761 on October 21, 2009, remembering the murder and commemorating the lives and work of the six Jesuit Priests, their housekeeper and her daughter in El Salvador. Your support and acknowledgment of the important education work of Catholic religious communities and institutions like the University of Central America José Simeón Cañas in El Salvador as well as the 28 Jesuit Colleges and Universities in the United States, is especially fitting.

As you know, the Catholic Church carries on the work of education with the goal of forming leaders that have great concern for the social and moral needs of the people. H. Res 761 rightly acknowledges “the legacy of the murdered Jesuits to reduce poverty and hunger and promote education opportunity, human rights, the rule of law, and social equity for the people of El Salvador.” This legacy continues to be embodied in the many women and men who continue to seek a more just, peaceful and secure world in charity and solidarity.

Pope Benedict XVI, in his most recent encyclical, Charity in Truth, states that “Charity is at the heart of the Church's social doctrine. … [Charity] gives real substance to the personal relationship with God and with neighbour; it is the principle not only of micro-relationships (with friends, with family members or within small groups) but also of macro-relationships (social, economic and political ones).” It is precisely this kind of charity that was exemplified by the Jesuits in El Salvador—a commitment to a more just and peaceful society where the human needs and rights of people are acknowledged and respected. The martyred Jesuits sought the common good, as many other Church members continue to do today. “To desire the common good and strive towards it is a requirement of justice and charity,” Pope Benedict XVI states in his encyclical.

USCCB joins you in commemorating the lives and work of the six Jesuits and their collaborators, and in continuing to seek ways to build the common good, not only in El Salvador but throughout our world.

Sincerely yours,

Most Reverend Howard J. Hubbard
Bishop of Albany
Chairman
Committee on International Justice and Peace
The Honorable Bill D. Delahunt
U.S. House of Representatives
2454 Rayburn HOB
Washington, DC 20515

Dear Representative Delahunt,

On behalf of the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops, I write to commend you for cosponsoring the House of Representatives’ Resolution 761 on October 21, 2009, remembering the murder and commemorating the lives and work of the six Jesuit Priests, their housekeeper and her daughter in El Salvador. Your support and acknowledgment of the important education work of Catholic religious communities and institutions like the University of Central America José Simeón Cañas in El Salvador as well as the 28 Jesuit Colleges and Universities in the United States, is especially fitting.

As you know, the Catholic Church carries on the work of education with the goal of forming leaders that have great concern for the social and moral needs of the people. H. Res 761 rightly acknowledges “the legacy of the murdered Jesuits to reduce poverty and hunger and promote education opportunity, human rights, the rule of law, and social equity for the people of El Salvador.” This legacy continues to be embodied in the many women and men who continue to seek a more just, peaceful and secure world in charity and solidarity.

Pope Benedict XVI, in his most recent encyclical, Charity in Truth, states that “Charity is at the heart of the Church's social doctrine. … [Charity] gives real substance to the personal relationship with God and with neighbour; it is the principle not only of micro-relationships (with friends, with family members or within small groups) but also of macro-relationships (social, economic and political ones).” It is precisely this kind of charity that was exemplified by the Jesuits in El Salvador—a commitment to a more just and peaceful society where the human needs and rights of people are acknowledged and respected. The martyred Jesuits sought the common good, as many other Church members continue to do today. “To desire the common good and strive towards it is a requirement of justice and charity,” Pope Benedict XVI states in his encyclical.

USCCB joins you in commemorating the lives and work of the six Jesuits and their collaborators, and in continuing to seek ways to build the common good, not only in El Salvador but throughout our world.

Sincerely yours,

Most Reverend Howard J. Hubbard
Bishop of Albany
Chairman
Committee on International Justice and Peace
October 28, 2009

The Honorable David Dreier
U.S. House of Representatives
233 Cannon HOB
Washington, DC 20515

Dear Representative Dreier,

On behalf of the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops, I write to commend you for cosponsoring the House of Representatives’ Resolution 761 on October 21, 2009, remembering the murder and commemorating the lives and work of the six Jesuit Priests, their housekeeper and her daughter in El Salvador. Your support and acknowledgment of the important education work of Catholic religious communities and institutions like the University of Central America José Simeón Cañas in El Salvador as well as the 28 Jesuit Colleges and Universities in the United States, is especially fitting.

As you know, the Catholic Church carries on the work of education with the goal of forming leaders that have great concern for the social and moral needs of the people. H. Res 761 rightly acknowledges “the legacy of the murdered Jesuits to reduce poverty and hunger and promote education opportunity, human rights, the rule of law, and social equity for the people of El Salvador.” This legacy continues to be embodied in the many women and men who continue to seek a more just, peaceful and secure world in charity and solidarity.

Pope Benedict XVI, in his most recent encyclical, Charity in Truth, states that “Charity is at the heart of the Church's social doctrine. … [Charity] gives real substance to the personal relationship with God and with neighbour; it is the principle not only of micro-relationships (with friends, with family members or within small groups) but also of macro-relationships (social, economic and political ones).” It is precisely this kind of charity that was exemplified by the Jesuits in El Salvador—a commitment to a more just and peaceful society where the human needs and rights of people are acknowledged and respected. The martyred Jesuits sought the common good, as many other Church members continue to do today. “To desire the common good and strive towards it is a requirement of justice and charity,” Pope Benedict XVI states in his encyclical.

USCCB joins you in commemorating the lives and work of the six Jesuits and their collaborators, and in continuing to seek ways to build the common good, not only in El Salvador but throughout our world.

Sincerely yours,

Most Reverend Howard J. Hubbard
Bishop of Albany
Chairman
Committee on International Justice and Peace
October 28, 2009

The Honorable Donna F. Edwards
U.S. House of Representatives
318 Cannon HOB
Washington, DC 20515

Dear Representative Edwards,

On behalf of the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops, I write to commend you for cosponsoring the House of Representatives’ Resolution 761 on October 21, 2009, remembering the murder and commemorating the lives and work of the six Jesuit Priests, their housekeeper and her daughter in El Salvador. Your support and acknowledgment of the important education work of Catholic religious communities and institutions like the University of Central America José Simeón Cañas in El Salvador as well as the 28 Jesuit Colleges and Universities in the United States, is especially fitting.

As you know, the Catholic Church carries on the work of education with the goal of forming leaders that have great concern for the social and moral needs of the people. H. Res 761 rightly acknowledges “the legacy of the murdered Jesuits to reduce poverty and hunger and promote education opportunity, human rights, the rule of law, and social equity for the people of El Salvador.” This legacy continues to be embodied in the many women and men who continue to seek a more just, peaceful and secure world in charity and solidarity.

Pope Benedict XVI, in his most recent encyclical, Charity in Truth, states that “Charity is at the heart of the Church's social doctrine. … [Charity] gives real substance to the personal relationship with God and with neighbour; it is the principle not only of micro-relationships (with friends, with family members or within small groups) but also of macro-relationships (social, economic and political ones).” It is precisely this kind of charity that was exemplified by the Jesuits in El Salvador—a commitment to a more just and peaceful society where the human needs and rights of people are acknowledged and respected. The martyred Jesuits sought the common good, as many other Church members continue to do today. “To desire the common good and strive towards it is a requirement of justice and charity,” Pope Benedict XVI states in his encyclical.

USCCB joins you in commemorating the lives and work of the six Jesuits and their collaborators, and in continuing to seek ways to build the common good, not only in El Salvador but throughout our world.

Sincerely yours,

Most Reverend Howard J. Hubbard
Bishop of Albany
Chairman
Committee on International Justice and Peace
October 28, 2009

The Honorable Keith M. Ellison
U.S. House of Representatives
1122 Longworth HOB
Washington, DC 20515

Dear Representative Ellison,

On behalf of the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops, I write to commend you for cosponsoring the House of Representatives’ Resolution 761 on October 21, 2009, remembering the murder and commemorating the lives and work of the six Jesuit Priests, their housekeeper and her daughter in El Salvador. Your support and acknowledgment of the important education work of Catholic religious communities and institutions like the University of Central America José Simeón Cañas in El Salvador as well as the 28 Jesuit Colleges and Universities in the United States, is especially fitting.

As you know, the Catholic Church carries on the work of education with the goal of forming leaders that have great concern for the social and moral needs of the people. H. Res 761 rightly acknowledges “the legacy of the murdered Jesuits to reduce poverty and hunger and promote education opportunity, human rights, the rule of law, and social equity for the people of El Salvador.” This legacy continues to be embodied in the many women and men who continue to seek a more just, peaceful and secure world in charity and solidarity.

Pope Benedict XVI, in his most recent encyclical, Charity in Truth, states that “Charity is at the heart of the Church's social doctrine. … [Charity] gives real substance to the personal relationship with God and with neighbour; it is the principle not only of micro-relationships (with friends, with family members or within small groups) but also of macro-relationships (social, economic and political ones).” It is precisely this kind of charity that was exemplified by the Jesuits in El Salvador—a commitment to a more just and peaceful society where the human needs and rights of people are acknowledged and respected. The martyred Jesuits sought the common good, as many other Church members continue to do today. “To desire the common good and strive towards it is a requirement of justice and charity,” Pope Benedict XVI states in his encyclical.

USCCB joins you in commemorating the lives and work of the six Jesuits and their collaborators, and in continuing to seek ways to build the common good, not only in El Salvador but throughout our world.

Sincerely yours,

Most Reverend Howard J. Hubbard
Bishop of Albany
Chairman
Committee on International Justice and Peace
October 28, 2009

The Honorable Jo Ann Emerson
U.S. House of Representatives
2440 Rayburn HOB
Washington, DC 20515

Dear Representative Emerson,

On behalf of the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops, I write to commend you for cosponsoring the House of Representatives’ Resolution 761 on October 21, 2009, remembering the murder and commemorating the lives and work of the six Jesuit Priests, their housekeeper and her daughter in El Salvador. Your support and acknowledgment of the important education work of Catholic religious communities and institutions like the University of Central America José Simeón Cañas in El Salvador as well as the 28 Jesuit Colleges and Universities in the United States, is especially fitting.

As you know, the Catholic Church carries on the work of education with the goal of forming leaders that have great concern for the social and moral needs of the people. H. Res 761 rightly acknowledges “the legacy of the murdered Jesuits to reduce poverty and hunger and promote education opportunity, human rights, the rule of law, and social equity for the people of El Salvador.” This legacy continues to be embodied in the many women and men who continue to seek a more just, peaceful and secure world in charity and solidarity.

Pope Benedict XVI, in his most recent encyclical, Charity in Truth, states that “Charity is at the heart of the Church's social doctrine. … [Charity] gives real substance to the personal relationship with God and with neighbour; it is the principle not only of micro-relationships (with friends, with family members or within small groups) but also of macro-relationships (social, economic and political ones).” It is precisely this kind of charity that was exemplified by the Jesuits in El Salvador—a commitment to a more just and peaceful society where the human needs and rights of people are acknowledged and respected. The martyred Jesuits sought the common good, as many other Church members continue to do today. “To desire the common good and strive towards it is a requirement of justice and charity,” Pope Benedict XVI states in his encyclical.

USCCB joins you in commemorating the lives and work of the six Jesuits and their collaborators, and in continuing to seek ways to build the common good, not only in El Salvador but throughout our world.

Sincerely yours,

Most Reverend Howard J. Hubbard
Bishop of Albany
Chairman
Committee on International Justice and Peace
October 28, 2009

The Honorable Eliot L. Engel
U.S. House of Representatives
2161 Rayburn HOB
Washington, DC 20515

Dear Representative Engel,

On behalf of the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops, I write to commend you for cosponsoring the House of Representatives’ Resolution 761 on October 21, 2009, remembering the murder and commemorating the lives and work of the six Jesuit Priests, their housekeeper and her daughter in El Salvador. Your support and acknowledgment of the important education work of Catholic religious communities and institutions like the University of Central America José Simeón Cañas in El Salvador as well as the 28 Jesuit Colleges and Universities in the United States, is especially fitting.

As you know, the Catholic Church carries on the work of education with the goal of forming leaders that have great concern for the social and moral needs of the people. H. Res 761 rightly acknowledges “the legacy of the murdered Jesuits to reduce poverty and hunger and promote education opportunity, human rights, the rule of law, and social equity for the people of El Salvador.” This legacy continues to be embodied in the many women and men who continue to seek a more just, peaceful and secure world in charity and solidarity.

Pope Benedict XVI, in his most recent encyclical, Charity in Truth, states that “Charity is at the heart of the Church's social doctrine. … [Charity] gives real substance to the personal relationship with God and with neighbour; it is the principle not only of micro-relationships (with friends, with family members or within small groups) but also of macro-relationships (social, economic and political ones).” It is precisely this kind of charity that was exemplified by the Jesuits in El Salvador—a commitment to a more just and peaceful society where the human needs and rights of people are acknowledged and respected. The martyred Jesuits sought the common good, as many other Church members continue to do today. “To desire the common good and strive towards it is a requirement of justice and charity,” Pope Benedict XVI states in his encyclical.

USCCB joins you in commemorating the lives and work of the six Jesuits and their collaborators, and in continuing to seek ways to build the common good, not only in El Salvador but throughout our world.

Sincerely yours,

Most Reverend Howard J. Hubbard
Bishop of Albany
Chairman
Committee on International Justice and Peace
October 28, 2009

The Honorable Jeff Flake
U.S. House of Representatives
240 Cannon HOB
Washington, DC 20515

Dear Representative Flake,

On behalf of the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops, I write to commend you for cosponsoring the House of Representatives’ Resolution 761 on October 21, 2009, remembering the murder and commemorating the lives and work of the six Jesuit Priests, their housekeeper and her daughter in El Salvador. Your support and acknowledgment of the important education work of Catholic religious communities and institutions like the University of Central America José Simeón Cañas in El Salvador as well as the 28 Jesuit Colleges and Universities in the United States, is especially fitting.

As you know, the Catholic Church carries on the work of education with the goal of forming leaders that have great concern for the social and moral needs of the people. H. Res 761 rightly acknowledges “the legacy of the murdered Jesuits to reduce poverty and hunger and promote education opportunity, human rights, the rule of law, and social equity for the people of El Salvador.” This legacy continues to be embodied in the many women and men who continue to seek a more just, peaceful and secure world in charity and solidarity.

Pope Benedict XVI, in his most recent encyclical, Charity in Truth, states that “Charity is at the heart of the Church's social doctrine. … [Charity] gives real substance to the personal relationship with God and with neighbour; it is the principle not only of micro-relationships (with friends, with family members or within small groups) but also of macro-relationships (social, economic and political ones).” It is precisely this kind of charity that was exemplified by the Jesuits in El Salvador—a commitment to a more just and peaceful society where the human needs and rights of people are acknowledged and respected. The martyred Jesuits sought the common good, as many other Church members continue to do today. “To desire the common good and strive towards it is a requirement of justice and charity,” Pope Benedict XVI states in his encyclical.

USCCB joins you in commemorating the lives and work of the six Jesuits and their collaborators, and in continuing to seek ways to build the common good, not only in El Salvador but throughout our world.

Sincerely yours,

Most Reverend Howard J. Hubbard
Bishop of Albany
Chairman
Committee on International Justice and Peace
October 28, 2009

The Honorable Gene Green
U.S. House of Representatives
2372 Rayburn HOB
Washington, DC 20515

Dear Representative Green,

On behalf of the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops, I write to commend you for cosponsoring the House of Representatives’ Resolution 761 on October 21, 2009, remembering the murder and commemorating the lives and work of the six Jesuit Priests, their housekeeper and her daughter in El Salvador. Your support and acknowledgment of the important education work of Catholic religious communities and institutions like the University of Central America José Simeón Cañas in El Salvador as well as the 28 Jesuit Colleges and Universities in the United States, is especially fitting.

As you know, the Catholic Church carries on the work of education with the goal of forming leaders that have great concern for the social and moral needs of the people. H. Res 761 rightly acknowledges “the legacy of the murdered Jesuits to reduce poverty and hunger and promote education opportunity, human rights, the rule of law, and social equity for the people of El Salvador.” This legacy continues to be embodied in the many women and men who continue to seek a more just, peaceful and secure world in charity and solidarity.

Pope Benedict XVI, in his most recent encyclical, Charity in Truth, states that “Charity is at the heart of the Church's social doctrine. … [Charity] gives real substance to the personal relationship with God and with neighbour; it is the principle not only of micro-relationships (with friends, with family members or within small groups) but also of macro-relationships (social, economic and political ones).” It is precisely this kind of charity that was exemplified by the Jesuits in El Salvador—a commitment to a more just and peaceful society where the human needs and rights of people are acknowledged and respected. The martyred Jesuits sought the common good, as many other Church members continue to do today. “To desire the common good and strive towards it is a requirement of justice and charity,” Pope Benedict XVI states in his encyclical.

USCCB joins you in commemorating the lives and work of the six Jesuits and their collaborators, and in continuing to seek ways to build the common good, not only in El Salvador but throughout our world.

Sincerely yours,

Most Reverend Howard J. Hubbard
Bishop of Albany
Chairman
Committee on International Justice and Peace
October 28, 2009

The Honorable Phil G. Hare
U.S. House of Representatives
428 Cannon HOB
Washington, DC 20515

Dear Representative Hare,

On behalf of the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops, I write to commend you for cosponsoring the House of Representatives’ Resolution 761 on October 21, 2009, remembering the murder and commemorating the lives and work of the six Jesuit Priests, their housekeeper and her daughter in El Salvador. Your support and acknowledgment of the important education work of Catholic religious communities and institutions like the University of Central America José Simeón Cañas in El Salvador as well as the 28 Jesuit Colleges and Universities in the United States, is especially fitting.

As you know, the Catholic Church carries on the work of education with the goal of forming leaders that have great concern for the social and moral needs of the people. H. Res 761 rightly acknowledges “the legacy of the murdered Jesuits to reduce poverty and hunger and promote education opportunity, human rights, the rule of law, and social equity for the people of El Salvador.” This legacy continues to be embodied in the many women and men who continue to seek a more just, peaceful and secure world in charity and solidarity.

Pope Benedict XVI, in his most recent encyclical, Charity in Truth, states that “Charity is at the heart of the Church's social doctrine. … [Charity] gives real substance to the personal relationship with God and with neighbour; it is the principle not only of micro-relationships (with friends, with family members or within small groups) but also of macro-relationships (social, economic and political ones).” It is precisely this kind of charity that was exemplified by the Jesuits in El Salvador—a commitment to a more just and peaceful society where the human needs and rights of people are acknowledged and respected. The martyred Jesuits sought the common good, as many other Church members continue to do today. “To desire the common good and strive towards it is a requirement of justice and charity,” Pope Benedict XVI states in his encyclical.

USCCB joins you in commemorating the lives and work of the six Jesuits and their collaborators, and in continuing to seek ways to build the common good, not only in El Salvador but throughout our world.

Sincerely yours,

Most Reverend Howard J. Hubbard
Bishop of Albany
Chairman
Committee on International Justice and Peace
October 28, 2009

The Honorable Ron Klein
U.S. House of Representatives
313 Cannon HOB
Washington, DC 20515

Dear Representative Klein,

On behalf of the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops, I write to commend you for cosponsoring the House of Representatives’ Resolution 761 on October 21, 2009, remembering the murder and commemorating the lives and work of the six Jesuit Priests, their housekeeper and her daughter in El Salvador. Your support and acknowledgment of the important education work of Catholic religious communities and institutions like the University of Central America José Simeón Cañas in El Salvador as well as the 28 Jesuit Colleges and Universities in the United States, is especially fitting.

As you know, the Catholic Church carries on the work of education with the goal of forming leaders that have great concern for the social and moral needs of the people. H. Res 761 rightly acknowledges “the legacy of the murdered Jesuits to reduce poverty and hunger and promote education opportunity, human rights, the rule of law, and social equity for the people of El Salvador.” This legacy continues to be embodied in the many women and men who continue to seek a more just, peaceful and secure world in charity and solidarity.

Pope Benedict XVI, in his most recent encyclical, Charity in Truth, states that “Charity is at the heart of the Church's social doctrine. … [Charity] gives real substance to the personal relationship with God and with neighbour; it is the principle not only of micro-relationships (with friends, with family members or within small groups) but also of macro-relationships (social, economic and political ones).” It is precisely this kind of charity that was exemplified by the Jesuits in El Salvador—a commitment to a more just and peaceful society where the human needs and rights of people are acknowledged and respected. The martyred Jesuits sought the common good, as many other Church members continue to do today. “To desire the common good and strive towards it is a requirement of justice and charity,” Pope Benedict XVI states in his encyclical.

USCCB joins you in commemorating the lives and work of the six Jesuits and their collaborators, and in continuing to seek ways to build the common good, not only in El Salvador but throughout our world.

Sincerely yours,

Most Reverend Howard J. Hubbard
Bishop of Albany
Chairman
Committee on International Justice and Peace
October 28, 2009

The Honorable Stephen F. Lynch
U.S. House of Representatives
221 Cannon HOB
Washington, DC 20515

Dear Representative Lynch,

On behalf of the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops, I write to commend you for cosponsoring the House of Representatives’ Resolution 761 on October 21, 2009, remembering the murder and commemorating the lives and work of the six Jesuit Priests, their housekeeper and her daughter in El Salvador. Your support and acknowledgment of the important education work of Catholic religious communities and institutions like the University of Central America José Simeón Cañas in El Salvador as well as the 28 Jesuit Colleges and Universities in the United States, is especially fitting.

As you know, the Catholic Church carries on the work of education with the goal of forming leaders that have great concern for the social and moral needs of the people. H. Res 761 rightly acknowledges “the legacy of the murdered Jesuits to reduce poverty and hunger and promote education opportunity, human rights, the rule of law, and social equity for the people of El Salvador.” This legacy continues to be embodied in the many women and men who continue to seek a more just, peaceful and secure world in charity and solidarity.

Pope Benedict XVI, in his most recent encyclical, Charity in Truth, states that “Charity is at the heart of the Church's social doctrine. … [Charity] gives real substance to the personal relationship with God and with neighbour; it is the principle not only of micro-relationships (with friends, with family members or within small groups) but also of macro-relationships (social, economic and political ones).” It is precisely this kind of charity that was exemplified by the Jesuits in El Salvador—a commitment to a more just and peaceful society where the human needs and rights of people are acknowledged and respected. The martyred Jesuits sought the common good, as many other Church members continue to do today. “To desire the common good and strive towards it is a requirement of justice and charity,” Pope Benedict XVI states in his encyclical.

USCCB joins you in commemorating the lives and work of the six Jesuits and their collaborators, and in continuing to seek ways to build the common good, not only in El Salvador but throughout our world.

Sincerely yours,

Most Reverend Howard J. Hubbard
Bishop of Albany
Chairman
Committee on International Justice and Peace
October 28, 2009

The Honorable Michael E. McMahon
U.S. House of Representatives
323 Cannon HOB
Washington, DC 20515

Dear Representative McMahon,

On behalf of the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops, I write to commend you for cosponsoring the House of Representatives’ Resolution 761 on October 21, 2009, remembering the murder and commemorating the lives and work of the six Jesuit Priests, their housekeeper and her daughter in El Salvador. Your support and acknowledgment of the important education work of Catholic religious communities and institutions like the University of Central America José Simeón Cañas in El Salvador as well as the 28 Jesuit Colleges and Universities in the United States, is especially fitting.

As you know, the Catholic Church carries on the work of education with the goal of forming leaders that have great concern for the social and moral needs of the people. H. Res 761 rightly acknowledges “the legacy of the murdered Jesuits to reduce poverty and hunger and promote education opportunity, human rights, the rule of law, and social equity for the people of El Salvador.” This legacy continues to be embodied in the many women and men who continue to seek a more just, peaceful and secure world in charity and solidarity.

Pope Benedict XVI, in his most recent encyclical, Charity in Truth, states that “Charity is at the heart of the Church's social doctrine. … [Charity] gives real substance to the personal relationship with God and with neighbour; it is the principle not only of micro-relationships (with friends, with family members or within small groups) but also of macro-relationships (social, economic and political ones).” It is precisely this kind of charity that was exemplified by the Jesuits in El Salvador—a commitment to a more just and peaceful society where the human needs and rights of people are acknowledged and respected. The martyred Jesuits sought the common good, as many other Church members continue to do today. “To desire the common good and strive towards it is a requirement of justice and charity,” Pope Benedict XVI states in his encyclical.

USCCB joins you in commemorating the lives and work of the six Jesuits and their collaborators, and in continuing to seek ways to build the common good, not only in El Salvador but throughout our world.

Sincerely yours,

Most Reverend Howard J. Hubbard
Bishop of Albany
Chairman
Committee on International Justice and Peace
October 28, 2009

The Honorable Brad Miller
U.S. House of Representatives
1127 Longworth HOB
Washington, DC 20515

Dear Representative Miller,

On behalf of the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops, I write to commend you for cosponsoring the House of Representatives’ Resolution 761 on October 21, 2009, remembering the murder and commemorating the lives and work of the six Jesuit Priests, their housekeeper and her daughter in El Salvador. Your support and acknowledgment of the important education work of Catholic religious communities and institutions like the University of Central America José Simeón Cañas in El Salvador as well as the 28 Jesuit Colleges and Universities in the United States, is especially fitting.

As you know, the Catholic Church carries on the work of education with the goal of forming leaders that have great concern for the social and moral needs of the people. H. Res 761 rightly acknowledges “the legacy of the murdered Jesuits to reduce poverty and hunger and promote education opportunity, human rights, the rule of law, and social equity for the people of El Salvador.” This legacy continues to be embodied in the many women and men who continue to seek a more just, peaceful and secure world in charity and solidarity.

Pope Benedict XVI, in his most recent encyclical, Charity in Truth, states that “Charity is at the heart of the Church's social doctrine. … [Charity] gives real substance to the personal relationship with God and with neighbour; it is the principle not only of micro-relationships (with friends, with family members or within small groups) but also of macro-relationships (social, economic and political ones).” It is precisely this kind of charity that was exemplified by the Jesuits in El Salvador—a commitment to a more just and peaceful society where the human needs and rights of people are acknowledged and respected. The martyred Jesuits sought the common good, as many other Church members continue to do today. “To desire the common good and strive towards it is a requirement of justice and charity,” Pope Benedict XVI states in his encyclical.

USCCB joins you in commemorating the lives and work of the six Jesuits and their collaborators, and in continuing to seek ways to build the common good, not only in El Salvador but throughout our world.

Sincerely yours,

Most Reverend Howard J. Hubbard
Bishop of Albany
Chairman
Committee on International Justice and Peace
October 28, 2009

The Honorable Jerrold Nadler
U.S. House of Representatives
2334 Rayburn HOB
Washington, DC 20515

Dear Representative Nadler,

On behalf of the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops, I write to commend you for cosponsoring the House of Representatives’ Resolution 761 on October 21, 2009, remembering the murder and commemorating the lives and work of the six Jesuit Priests, their housekeeper and her daughter in El Salvador. Your support and acknowledgment of the important education work of Catholic religious communities and institutions like the University of Central America José Simeón Cañas in El Salvador as well as the 28 Jesuit Colleges and Universities in the United States, is especially fitting.

As you know, the Catholic Church carries on the work of education with the goal of forming leaders that have great concern for the social and moral needs of the people. H. Res 761 rightly acknowledges “the legacy of the murdered Jesuits to reduce poverty and hunger and promote education opportunity, human rights, the rule of law, and social equity for the people of El Salvador.” This legacy continues to be embodied in the many women and men who continue to seek a more just, peaceful and secure world in charity and solidarity.

Pope Benedict XVI, in his most recent encyclical, Charity in Truth, states that “Charity is at the heart of the Church's social doctrine. … [Charity] gives real substance to the personal relationship with God and with neighbour; it is the principle not only of micro-relationships (with friends, with family members or within small groups) but also of macro-relationships (social, economic and political ones).” It is precisely this kind of charity that was exemplified by the Jesuits in El Salvador—a commitment to a more just and peaceful society where the human needs and rights of people are acknowledged and respected. The martyred Jesuits sought the common good, as many other Church members continue to do today. “To desire the common good and strive towards it is a requirement of justice and charity,” Pope Benedict XVI states in his encyclical.

USCCB joins you in commemorating the lives and work of the six Jesuits and their collaborators, and in continuing to seek ways to build the common good, not only in El Salvador but throughout our world.

Sincerely yours,

Most Reverend Howard J. Hubbard
Bishop of Albany
Chairman
Committee on International Justice and Peace
October 28, 2009

The Honorable Richard E. Neal
U.S. House of Representatives
2208 Rayburn HOB
Washington, DC 20515

Dear Representative Neal,

On behalf of the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops, I write to commend you for cosponsoring the House of Representatives’ Resolution 761 on October 21, 2009, remembering the murder and commemorating the lives and work of the six Jesuit Priests, their housekeeper and her daughter in El Salvador. Your support and acknowledgment of the important education work of Catholic religious communities and institutions like the University of Central America José Simeón Cañas in El Salvador as well as the 28 Jesuit Colleges and Universities in the United States, is especially fitting.

As you know, the Catholic Church carries on the work of education with the goal of forming leaders that have great concern for the social and moral needs of the people. H. Res 761 rightly acknowledges “the legacy of the murdered Jesuits to reduce poverty and hunger and promote education opportunity, human rights, the rule of law, and social equity for the people of El Salvador.” This legacy continues to be embodied in the many women and men who continue to seek a more just, peaceful and secure world in charity and solidarity.

Pope Benedict XVI, in his most recent encyclical, Charity in Truth, states that “Charity is at the heart of the Church's social doctrine. … [Charity] gives real substance to the personal relationship with God and with neighbour; it is the principle not only of micro-relationships (with friends, with family members or within small groups) but also of macro-relationships (social, economic and political ones).” It is precisely this kind of charity that was exemplified by the Jesuits in El Salvador—a commitment to a more just and peaceful society where the human needs and rights of people are acknowledged and respected. The martyred Jesuits sought the common good, as many other Church members continue to do today. “To desire the common good and strive towards it is a requirement of justice and charity,” Pope Benedict XVI states in his encyclical.

USCCB joins you in commemorating the lives and work of the six Jesuits and their collaborators, and in continuing to seek ways to build the common good, not only in El Salvador but throughout our world.

Sincerely yours,

Most Reverend Howard J. Hubbard
Bishop of Albany
Chairman
Committee on International Justice and Peace
October 28, 2009

The Honorable John W. Olver
U.S. House of Representatives
1111 Longworth HOB
Washington, DC 20515

Dear Representative Olver,

On behalf of the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops, I write to commend you for cosponsoring the House of Representatives’ Resolution 761 on October 21, 2009, remembering the murder and commemorating the lives and work of the six Jesuit Priests, their housekeeper and her daughter in El Salvador. Your support and acknowledgment of the important education work of Catholic religious communities and institutions like the University of Central America José Simeón Cañas in El Salvador as well as the 28 Jesuit Colleges and Universities in the United States, is especially fitting.

As you know, the Catholic Church carries on the work of education with the goal of forming leaders that have great concern for the social and moral needs of the people. H. Res 761 rightly acknowledges “the legacy of the murdered Jesuits to reduce poverty and hunger and promote education opportunity, human rights, the rule of law, and social equity for the people of El Salvador.” This legacy continues to be embodied in the many women and men who continue to seek a more just, peaceful and secure world in charity and solidarity.

Pope Benedict XVI, in his most recent encyclical, Charity in Truth, states that “Charity is at the heart of the Church's social doctrine. … [Charity] gives real substance to the personal relationship with God and with neighbour; it is the principle not only of micro-relationships (with friends, with family members or within small groups) but also of macro-relationships (social, economic and political ones).” It is precisely this kind of charity that was exemplified by the Jesuits in El Salvador—a commitment to a more just and peaceful society where the human needs and rights of people are acknowledged and respected. The martyred Jesuits sought the common good, as many other Church members continue to do today. “To desire the common good and strive towards it is a requirement of justice and charity,” Pope Benedict XVI states in his encyclical.

USCCB joins you in commemorating the lives and work of the six Jesuits and their collaborators, and in continuing to seek ways to build the common good, not only in El Salvador but throughout our world.

Sincerely yours,

Most Reverend Howard J. Hubbard
Bishop of Albany
Chairman
Committee on International Justice and Peace
October 28, 2009

The Honorable Ed Pastor
U.S. House of Representatives
2465 Rayburn HOB
Washington, DC 20515

Dear Representative Pastor,

On behalf of the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops, I write to commend you for cosponsoring the House of Representatives’ Resolution 761 on October 21, 2009, remembering the murder and commemorating the lives and work of the six Jesuit Priests, their housekeeper and her daughter in El Salvador. Your support and acknowledgment of the important education work of Catholic religious communities and institutions like the University of Central America José Simeón Cañas in El Salvador as well as the 28 Jesuit Colleges and Universities in the United States, is especially fitting.

As you know, the Catholic Church carries on the work of education with the goal of forming leaders that have great concern for the social and moral needs of the people. H. Res 761 rightly acknowledges “the legacy of the murdered Jesuits to reduce poverty and hunger and promote education opportunity, human rights, the rule of law, and social equity for the people of El Salvador.” This legacy continues to be embodied in the many women and men who continue to seek a more just, peaceful and secure world in charity and solidarity.

Pope Benedict XVI, in his most recent encyclical, Charity in Truth, states that “Charity is at the heart of the Church's social doctrine. … [Charity] gives real substance to the personal relationship with God and with neighbour; it is the principle not only of micro-relationships (with friends, with family members or within small groups) but also of macro-relationships (social, economic and political ones).” It is precisely this kind of charity that was exemplified by the Jesuits in El Salvador—a commitment to a more just and peaceful society where the human needs and rights of people are acknowledged and respected. The martyred Jesuits sought the common good, as many other Church members continue to do today. “To desire the common good and strive towards it is a requirement of justice and charity,” Pope Benedict XVI states in his encyclical.

USCCB joins you in commemorating the lives and work of the six Jesuits and their collaborators, and in continuing to seek ways to build the common good, not only in El Salvador but throughout our world.

Sincerely yours,

Most Reverend Howard J. Hubbard
Bishop of Albany
Chairman
Committee on International Justice and Peace
October 28, 2009

The Honorable Dana Rohrabacher
U.S. House of Representatives
2300 Rayburn HOB
Washington, DC 20515

Dear Representative Rohrabacher,

On behalf of the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops, I write to commend you for cosponsoring the House of Representatives’ Resolution 761 on October 21, 2009, remembering the murder and commemorating the lives and work of the six Jesuit Priests, their housekeeper and her daughter in El Salvador. Your support and acknowledgment of the important education work of Catholic religious communities and institutions like the University of Central America José Simeón Cañas in El Salvador as well as the 28 Jesuit Colleges and Universities in the United States, is especially fitting.

As you know, the Catholic Church carries on the work of education with the goal of forming leaders that have great concern for the social and moral needs of the people. H. Res 761 rightly acknowledges “the legacy of the murdered Jesuits to reduce poverty and hunger and promote education opportunity, human rights, the rule of law, and social equity for the people of El Salvador.” This legacy continues to be embodied in the many women and men who continue to seek a more just, peaceful and secure world in charity and solidarity.

Pope Benedict XVI, in his most recent encyclical, Charity in Truth, states that “Charity is at the heart of the Church's social doctrine. … [Charity] gives real substance to the personal relationship with God and with neighbour; it is the principle not only of micro-relationships (with friends, with family members or within small groups) but also of macro-relationships (social, economic and political ones).” It is precisely this kind of charity that was exemplified by the Jesuits in El Salvador—a commitment to a more just and peaceful society where the human needs and rights of people are acknowledged and respected. The martyred Jesuits sought the common good, as many other Church members continue to do today. “To desire the common good and strive towards it is a requirement of justice and charity,” Pope Benedict XVI states in his encyclical.

USCCB joins you in commemorating the lives and work of the six Jesuits and their collaborators, and in continuing to seek ways to build the common good, not only in El Salvador but throughout our world.

Sincerely yours,

Most Reverend Howard J. Hubbard
Bishop of Albany
Chairman
Committee on International Justice and Peace
October 28, 2009

The Honorable David Scott
U.S. House of Representatives
225 Cannon HOB
Washington, DC 20515

Dear Representative Scott,

On behalf of the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops, I write to commend you for cosponsoring the House of Representatives’ Resolution 761 on October 21, 2009, remembering the murder and commemorating the lives and work of the six Jesuit Priests, their housekeeper and her daughter in El Salvador. Your support and acknowledgment of the important education work of Catholic religious communities and institutions like the University of Central America José Simeón Cañas in El Salvador as well as the 28 Jesuit Colleges and Universities in the United States, is especially fitting.

As you know, the Catholic Church carries on the work of education with the goal of forming leaders that have great concern for the social and moral needs of the people. H. Res 761 rightly acknowledges “the legacy of the murdered Jesuits to reduce poverty and hunger and promote education opportunity, human rights, the rule of law, and social equity for the people of El Salvador.” This legacy continues to be embodied in the many women and men who continue to seek a more just, peaceful and secure world in charity and solidarity.

Pope Benedict XVI, in his most recent encyclical, Charity in Truth, states that “Charity is at the heart of the Church's social doctrine. … [Charity] gives real substance to the personal relationship with God and with neighbour; it is the principle not only of micro-relationships (with friends, with family members or within small groups) but also of macro-relationships (social, economic and political ones).” It is precisely this kind of charity that was exemplified by the Jesuits in El Salvador—a commitment to a more just and peaceful society where the human needs and rights of people are acknowledged and respected. The martyred Jesuits sought the common good, as many other Church members continue to do today. “To desire the common good and strive towards it is a requirement of justice and charity,” Pope Benedict XVI states in his encyclical.

USCCB joins you in commemorating the lives and work of the six Jesuits and their collaborators, and in continuing to seek ways to build the common good, not only in El Salvador but throughout our world.

Sincerely yours,

Most Reverend Howard J. Hubbard
Bishop of Albany
Chairman
Committee on International Justice and Peace
The Honorable Brad Sherman
U.S. House of Representatives
2242 Rayburn HOB
Washington, DC 20515

Dear Representative Sherman,

On behalf of the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops, I write to commend you for cosponsoring the House of Representatives’ Resolution 761 on October 21, 2009, remembering the murder and commemorating the lives and work of the six Jesuit Priests, their housekeeper and her daughter in El Salvador. Your support and acknowledgment of the important education work of Catholic religious communities and institutions like the University of Central America José Simeón Cañas in El Salvador as well as the 28 Jesuit Colleges and Universities in the United States, is especially fitting.

As you know, the Catholic Church carries on the work of education with the goal of forming leaders that have great concern for the social and moral needs of the people. H. Res 761 rightly acknowledges “the legacy of the murdered Jesuits to reduce poverty and hunger and promote education opportunity, human rights, the rule of law, and social equity for the people of El Salvador.” This legacy continues to be embodied in the many women and men who continue to seek a more just, peaceful and secure world in charity and solidarity.

Pope Benedict XVI, in his most recent encyclical, Charity in Truth, states that “Charity is at the heart of the Church's social doctrine. … [Charity] gives real substance to the personal relationship with God and with neighbour; it is the principle not only of micro-relationships (with friends, with family members or within small groups) but also of macro-relationships (social, economic and political ones).” It is precisely this kind of charity that was exemplified by the Jesuits in El Salvador—a commitment to a more just and peaceful society where the human needs and rights of people are acknowledged and respected. The martyred Jesuits sought the common good, as many other Church members continue to do today. “To desire the common good and strive towards it is a requirement of justice and charity,” Pope Benedict XVI states in his encyclical.

USCCB joins you in commemorating the lives and work of the six Jesuits and their collaborators, and in continuing to seek ways to build the common good, not only in El Salvador but throughout our world.

Sincerely yours,

Most Reverend Howard J. Hubbard
Bishop of Albany
Chairman
Committee on International Justice and Peace
October 28, 2009

The Honorable Albio Sires
U.S. House of Representatives
1024 Longworth HOB
Washington, DC 20515

Dear Representative Sires,

On behalf of the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops, I write to commend you for cosponsoring the House of Representatives’ Resolution 761 on October 21, 2009, remembering the murder and commemorating the lives and work of the six Jesuit Priests, their housekeeper and her daughter in El Salvador. Your support and acknowledgment of the important education work of Catholic religious communities and institutions like the University of Central America José Simeón Cañas in El Salvador as well as the 28 Jesuit Colleges and Universities in the United States, is especially fitting.

As you know, the Catholic Church carries on the work of education with the goal of forming leaders that have great concern for the social and moral needs of the people. H. Res 761 rightly acknowledges “the legacy of the murdered Jesuits to reduce poverty and hunger and promote education opportunity, human rights, the rule of law, and social equity for the people of El Salvador.” This legacy continues to be embodied in the many women and men who continue to seek a more just, peaceful and secure world in charity and solidarity.

Pope Benedict XVI, in his most recent encyclical, Charity in Truth, states that “Charity is at the heart of the Church's social doctrine. … [Charity] gives real substance to the personal relationship with God and with neighbour; it is the principle not only of micro-relationships (with friends, with family members or within small groups) but also of macro-relationships (social, economic and political ones).” It is precisely this kind of charity that was exemplified by the Jesuits in El Salvador—a commitment to a more just and peaceful society where the human needs and rights of people are acknowledged and respected. The martyred Jesuits sought the common good, as many other Church members continue to do today. “To desire the common good and strive towards it is a requirement of justice and charity,” Pope Benedict XVI states in his encyclical.

USCCB joins you in commemorating the lives and work of the six Jesuits and their collaborators, and in continuing to seek ways to build the common good, not only in El Salvador but throughout our world.

Sincerely yours,

Most Reverend Howard J. Hubbard
Bishop of Albany
Chairman
Committee on International Justice and Peace
October 28, 2009

The Honorable Louise M. Slaughter
U.S. House of Representatives
2469 Rayburn HOB
Washington, DC 20515

Dear Representative Slaughter,

On behalf of the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops, I write to commend you for cosponsoring the House of Representatives’ Resolution 761 on October 21, 2009, remembering the murder and commemorating the lives and work of the six Jesuit Priests, their housekeeper and her daughter in El Salvador. Your support and acknowledgment of the important education work of Catholic religious communities and institutions like the University of Central America José Simeón Cañas in El Salvador as well as the 28 Jesuit Colleges and Universities in the United States, is especially fitting.

As you know, the Catholic Church carries on the work of education with the goal of forming leaders that have great concern for the social and moral needs of the people. H. Res 761 rightly acknowledges “the legacy of the murdered Jesuits to reduce poverty and hunger and promote education opportunity, human rights, the rule of law, and social equity for the people of El Salvador.” This legacy continues to be embodied in the many women and men who continue to seek a more just, peaceful and secure world in charity and solidarity.

Pope Benedict XVI, in his most recent encyclical, Charity in Truth, states that “Charity is at the heart of the Church's social doctrine. … [Charity] gives real substance to the personal relationship with God and with neighbour; it is the principle not only of micro-relationships (with friends, with family members or within small groups) but also of macro-relationships (social, economic and political ones).” It is precisely this kind of charity that was exemplified by the Jesuits in El Salvador—a commitment to a more just and peaceful society where the human needs and rights of people are acknowledged and respected. The martyred Jesuits sought the common good, as many other Church members continue to do today. “To desire the common good and strive towards it is a requirement of justice and charity,” Pope Benedict XVI states in his encyclical.

USCCB joins you in commemorating the lives and work of the six Jesuits and their collaborators, and in continuing to seek ways to build the common good, not only in El Salvador but throughout our world.

Sincerely yours,

Most Reverend Howard J. Hubbard
Bishop of Albany
Chairman
Committee on International Justice and Peace
The Honorable Christopher H. Smith
U.S. House of Representatives
2373 Rayburn HOB
Washington, DC 20515

Dear Representative Smith,

On behalf of the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops, I write to commend you for cosponsoring the House of Representatives’ Resolution 761 on October 21, 2009, remembering the murder and commemorating the lives and work of the six Jesuit Priests, their housekeeper and her daughter in El Salvador. Your support and acknowledgment of the important education work of Catholic religious communities and institutions like the University of Central America José Simeón Cañas in El Salvador as well as the 28 Jesuit Colleges and Universities in the United States, is especially fitting.

As you know, the Catholic Church carries on the work of education with the goal of forming leaders that have great concern for the social and moral needs of the people. H. Res 761 rightly acknowledges “the legacy of the murdered Jesuits to reduce poverty and hunger and promote education opportunity, human rights, the rule of law, and social equity for the people of El Salvador.” This legacy continues to be embodied in the many women and men who continue to seek a more just, peaceful and secure world in charity and solidarity.

Pope Benedict XVI, in his most recent encyclical, Charity in Truth, states that “Charity is at the heart of the Church's social doctrine. … [Charity] gives real substance to the personal relationship with God and with neighbour; it is the principle not only of micro-relationships (with friends, with family members or within small groups) but also of macro-relationships (social, economic and political ones).” It is precisely this kind of charity that was exemplified by the Jesuits in El Salvador—a commitment to a more just and peaceful society where the human needs and rights of people are acknowledged and respected. The martyred Jesuits sought the common good, as many other Church members continue to do today. “To desire the common good and strive towards it is a requirement of justice and charity,” Pope Benedict XVI states in his encyclical.

USCCB joins you in commemorating the lives and work of the six Jesuits and their collaborators, and in continuing to seek ways to build the common good, not only in El Salvador but throughout our world.

Sincerely yours,

Most Reverend Howard J. Hubbard
Bishop of Albany
Chairman
Committee on International Justice and Peace
October 28, 2009

The Honorable John F. Tierney
U.S. House of Representatives
2238 Rayburn HOB
Washington, DC 20515

Dear Representative Tierney,

On behalf of the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops, I write to commend you for cosponsoring the House of Representatives’ Resolution 761 on October 21, 2009, remembering the murder and commemorating the lives and work of the six Jesuit Priests, their housekeeper and her daughter in El Salvador. Your support and acknowledgment of the important education work of Catholic religious communities and institutions like the University of Central America José Simeón Cañas in El Salvador as well as the 28 Jesuit Colleges and Universities in the United States, is especially fitting.

As you know, the Catholic Church carries on the work of education with the goal of forming leaders that have great concern for the social and moral needs of the people. H. Res 761 rightly acknowledges “the legacy of the murdered Jesuits to reduce poverty and hunger and promote education opportunity, human rights, the rule of law, and social equity for the people of El Salvador.” This legacy continues to be embodied in the many women and men who continue to seek a more just, peaceful and secure world in charity and solidarity.

Pope Benedict XVI, in his most recent encyclical, Charity in Truth, states that “Charity is at the heart of the Church's social doctrine. … [Charity] gives real substance to the personal relationship with God and with neighbour; it is the principle not only of micro-relationships (with friends, with family members or within small groups) but also of macro-relationships (social, economic and political ones).” It is precisely this kind of charity that was exemplified by the Jesuits in El Salvador—a commitment to a more just and peaceful society where the human needs and rights of people are acknowledged and respected. The martyred Jesuits sought the common good, as many other Church members continue to do today. “To desire the common good and strive towards it is a requirement of justice and charity,” Pope Benedict XVI states in his encyclical.

USCCB joins you in commemorating the lives and work of the six Jesuits and their collaborators, and in continuing to seek ways to build the common good, not only in El Salvador but throughout our world.

Sincerely yours,

Most Reverend Howard J. Hubbard
Bishop of Albany
Chairman
Committee on International Justice and Peace
October 28, 2009

The Honorable Diane Watson
U.S. House of Representatives
2430 Rayburn HOB
Washington, DC 20515

Dear Representative Watson,

On behalf of the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops, I write to commend you for cosponsoring the House of Representatives’ Resolution 761 on October 21, 2009, remembering the murder and commemorating the lives and work of the six Jesuit Priests, their housekeeper and her daughter in El Salvador. Your support and acknowledgment of the important education work of Catholic religious communities and institutions like the University of Central America José Simeón Cañas in El Salvador as well as the 28 Jesuit Colleges and Universities in the United States, is especially fitting.

As you know, the Catholic Church carries on the work of education with the goal of forming leaders that have great concern for the social and moral needs of the people. H. Res 761 rightly acknowledges “the legacy of the murdered Jesuits to reduce poverty and hunger and promote education opportunity, human rights, the rule of law, and social equity for the people of El Salvador.” This legacy continues to be embodied in the many women and men who continue to seek a more just, peaceful and secure world in charity and solidarity.

Pope Benedict XVI, in his most recent encyclical, Charity in Truth, states that “Charity is at the heart of the Church's social doctrine. … [Charity] gives real substance to the personal relationship with God and with neighbour; it is the principle not only of micro-relationships (with friends, with family members or within small groups) but also of macro-relationships (social, economic and political ones).” It is precisely this kind of charity that was exemplified by the Jesuits in El Salvador—a commitment to a more just and peaceful society where the human needs and rights of people are acknowledged and respected. The martyred Jesuits sought the common good, as many other Church members continue to do today. “To desire the common good and strive towards it is a requirement of justice and charity,” Pope Benedict XVI states in his encyclical.

USCCB joins you in commemorating the lives and work of the six Jesuits and their collaborators, and in continuing to seek ways to build the common good, not only in El Salvador but throughout our world.

Sincerely yours,

Most Reverend Howard J. Hubbard
Bishop of Albany
Chairman
Committee on International Justice and Peace
October 28, 2009

The Honorable Frank R. Wolf
U.S. House of Representatives
241 Cannon HOB
Washington, DC 20515

Dear Representative Wolf,

On behalf of the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops, I write to commend you for cosponsoring the House of Representatives’ Resolution 761 on October 21, 2009, remembering the murder and commemorating the lives and work of the six Jesuit Priests, their housekeeper and her daughter in El Salvador. Your support and acknowledgment of the important education work of Catholic religious communities and institutions like the University of Central America José Simeón Cañas in El Salvador as well as the 28 Jesuit Colleges and Universities in the United States, is especially fitting.

As you know, the Catholic Church carries on the work of education with the goal of forming leaders that have great concern for the social and moral needs of the people. H. Res 761 rightly acknowledges “the legacy of the murdered Jesuits to reduce poverty and hunger and promote education opportunity, human rights, the rule of law, and social equity for the people of El Salvador.” This legacy continues to be embodied in the many women and men who continue to seek a more just, peaceful and secure world in charity and solidarity.

Pope Benedict XVI, in his most recent encyclical, Charity in Truth, states that “Charity is at the heart of the Church's social doctrine. … [Charity] gives real substance to the personal relationship with God and with neighbour; it is the principle not only of micro-relationships (with friends, with family members or within small groups) but also of macro-relationships (social, economic and political ones).” It is precisely this kind of charity that was exemplified by the Jesuits in El Salvador—a commitment to a more just and peaceful society where the human needs and rights of people are acknowledged and respected. The martyred Jesuits sought the common good, as many other Church members continue to do today. “To desire the common good and strive towards it is a requirement of justice and charity,” Pope Benedict XVI states in his encyclical.

USCCB joins you in commemorating the lives and work of the six Jesuits and their collaborators, and in continuing to seek ways to build the common good, not only in El Salvador but throughout our world.

Sincerely yours,

Most Reverend Howard J. Hubbard
Bishop of Albany
Chairman
Committee on International Justice and Peace
October 28, 2009

The Honorable Lynn Woolsey
U.S. House of Representatives
2263 Rayburn HOB
Washington, DC 20515

Dear Representative Woolsey,

On behalf of the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops, I write to commend you for cosponsoring the House of Representatives’ Resolution 761 on October 21, 2009, remembering the murder and commemorating the lives and work of the six Jesuit Priests, their housekeeper and her daughter in El Salvador. Your support and acknowledgment of the important education work of Catholic religious communities and institutions like the University of Central America José Simeón Cañas in El Salvador as well as the 28 Jesuit Colleges and Universities in the United States, is especially fitting.

As you know, the Catholic Church carries on the work of education with the goal of forming leaders that have great concern for the social and moral needs of the people. H. Res 761 rightly acknowledges “the legacy of the murdered Jesuits to reduce poverty and hunger and promote education opportunity, human rights, the rule of law, and social equity for the people of El Salvador.” This legacy continues to be embodied in the many women and men who continue to seek a more just, peaceful and secure world in charity and solidarity.

Pope Benedict XVI, in his most recent encyclical, Charity in Truth, states that “Charity is at the heart of the Church's social doctrine. … [Charity] gives real substance to the personal relationship with God and with neighbour; it is the principle not only of micro-relationships (with friends, with family members or within small groups) but also of macro-relationships (social, economic and political ones).” It is precisely this kind of charity that was exemplified by the Jesuits in El Salvador—a commitment to a more just and peaceful society where the human needs and rights of people are acknowledged and respected. The martyred Jesuits sought the common good, as many other Church members continue to do today. “To desire the common good and strive towards it is a requirement of justice and charity,” Pope Benedict XVI states in his encyclical.

USCCB joins you in commemorating the lives and work of the six Jesuits and their collaborators, and in continuing to seek ways to build the common good, not only in El Salvador but throughout our world.

Sincerely yours,

Most Reverend Howard J. Hubbard
Bishop of Albany
Chairman
Committee on International Justice and Peace
October 28, 2009

The Honorable Jerry Cosetello
U.S. House of Representatives
2408 Rayburn HOB
Washington, DC 20515

Dear Representative Cosetello,

On behalf of the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops, I write to commend you for cosponsoring the House of Representatives’ Resolution 761 on October 21, 2009, remembering the murder and commemorating the lives and work of the six Jesuit Priests, their housekeeper and her daughter in El Salvador. Your support and acknowledgment of the important education work of Catholic religious communities and institutions like the University of Central America José Simeón Cañas in El Salvador as well as the 28 Jesuit Colleges and Universities in the United States, is especially fitting.

As you know, the Catholic Church carries on the work of education with the goal of forming leaders that have great concern for the social and moral needs of the people. H. Res 761 rightly acknowledges “the legacy of the murdered Jesuits to reduce poverty and hunger and promote education opportunity, human rights, the rule of law, and social equity for the people of El Salvador.” This legacy continues to be embodied in the many women and men who continue to seek a more just, peaceful and secure world in charity and solidarity.

Pope Benedict XVI, in his most recent encyclical, Charity in Truth, states that “Charity is at the heart of the Church's social doctrine. … [Charity] gives real substance to the personal relationship with God and with neighbour; it is the principle not only of micro-relationships (with friends, with family members or within small groups) but also of macro-relationships (social, economic and political ones).” It is precisely this kind of charity that was exemplified by the Jesuits in El Salvador—a commitment to a more just and peaceful society where the human needs and rights of people are acknowledged and respected. The martyred Jesuits sought the common good, as many other Church members continue to do today. “To desire the common good and strive towards it is a requirement of justice and charity,” Pope Benedict XVI states in his encyclical.

USCCB joins you in commemorating the lives and work of the six Jesuits and their collaborators, and in continuing to seek ways to build the common good, not only in El Salvador but throughout our world.

Sincerely yours,

Most Reverend Howard J. Hubbard
Bishop of Albany
Chairman
Committee on International Justice and Peace
The Honorable James McGovern
U.S. House of Representatives
438 Cannon HOB
Washington, DC 20515

Dear Representative McGovern,

On behalf of the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops, I write to commend you for cosponsoring the House of Representatives’ Resolution 761 on October 21, 2009, remembering the murder and commemorating the lives and work of the six Jesuit Priests, their housekeeper and her daughter in El Salvador. Your support and acknowledgment of the important education work of Catholic religious communities and institutions like the University of Central America José Simeón Cañas in El Salvador as well as the 28 Jesuit Colleges and Universities in the United States, is especially fitting.

As you know, the Catholic Church carries on the work of education with the goal of forming leaders that have great concern for the social and moral needs of the people. H. Res 761 rightly acknowledges “the legacy of the murdered Jesuits to reduce poverty and hunger and promote education opportunity, human rights, the rule of law, and social equity for the people of El Salvador.” This legacy continues to be embodied in the many women and men who continue to seek a more just, peaceful and secure world in charity and solidarity.

Pope Benedict XVI, in his most recent encyclical, Charity in Truth, states that “Charity is at the heart of the Church's social doctrine. … [Charity] gives real substance to the personal relationship with God and with neighbour; it is the principle not only of micro-relationships (with friends, with family members or within small groups) but also of macro-relationships (social, economic and political ones).” It is precisely this kind of charity that was exemplified by the Jesuits in El Salvador—a commitment to a more just and peaceful society where the human needs and rights of people are acknowledged and respected. The martyred Jesuits sought the common good, as many other Church members continue to do today. “To desire the common good and strive towards it is a requirement of justice and charity,” Pope Benedict XVI states in his encyclical.

USCCB joins you in commemorating the lives and work of the six Jesuits and their collaborators, and in continuing to seek ways to build the common good, not only in El Salvador but throughout our world.

Sincerely yours,

Most Reverend Howard J. Hubbard
Bishop of Albany
Chairman
Committee on International Justice and Peace